The medieval coroner is not like a modern coroner, and there is a complete absence of forensic science in this age. The coroner's duty was of legal capacity to the people and the crown—both of which elected him. He made sure that any felon, had there been one involved with the death, was punished, and that the crown received the deodand, if any.

Coroner, a public official whose principal duty in modern times is to inquire, with the help of a jury, into any death that appears to be unnatural. The office originated in England and was first referred to as custos placitorum (Latin: “keeper of the pleas”) in the Articles of Eyre of 1194, although there is some evidence that it may have existed earlier.

History. It is in the general interests of the community that any sudden, unnatural or unexplained deaths should be investigated and, to reflect this, the role of the Coroner has adapted over the eight centuries since the office was formally established in 1194, from being a form of medieval tax gatherer to an independent judicial officer charged with the investigation of sudden, violent or unnatural death.

In medieval times, English coroners were Crown officials who held financial powers and conducted some judicial investigations in order to counterbalance the power of sheriffs. Depending on the jurisdiction, the coroner may adjudge the cause of death personally, or may act as the presiding officer of a special court (a "coroner's jury").
