Third World feminism stems from the idea that feminism in Third World countries is not imported from the First World, but originates from internal ideologies and socio-cultural factors. [4] Postcolonial feminism is sometimes criticized by mainstream feminism, which argues that postcolonial feminism weakens the wider feminist movement by dividing it. [5]

For third world women, while the "personal is political," the reverse is also true. In terms of the political being personal, women and men experience the same dehumanizing elements of poverty, unemployment and racism as domination and exploitation, though gender results in a differential experience of these oppressions.

The text itself is a series of nine essays which hone, sharpen, and extend Mohanty's general claims about a feminist theory and praxis that is based on the experiences and knowledges of Third World women. She claims, throughout, that global mechanisms of power are perhaps best understood by those who are subject to them
